

I'm not robot

Continue

Fios tv online

Syda Productions/Shutterstock So you've ditched the cable company, but now you're stuck with a dozen streaming services and their rising prices. Luckily, you can watch TV online for free. It just takes a little effort and a little patience. Streaming services become pricey If you hate paying for TV, then you've probably calculated the annual price of services like Netflix or Hulu. As it turns out, a Netflix and Hulu subscription will cost you more than $200 a year, and additional services will only bring that number higher. When you consider the current cost of streaming services, the annual price hikes of Netflix and Amazon Prime, and the addition of new services like Disney+, the future looks bleak – or at least expensive. We tend to think of these services as escaping cables, but they are starting to look like cable companies. Is there an escape from streaming services? Luckily, you don't have to pay netflix or Hulu to get your online TV fix. There are many ways to watch TV online for free, and some of them will make you wonder why someone pays $12.99 a month to subscribe to a streaming service. Borrow someone's login When it comes to sharing an account, streaming services are pretty weak. In fact, most streaming services encourage account sharing, at least within the family, with separate user profiles and pricing plans for multiple users. Ask your friend for login details, add a profile to their account, and go to town. You can also borrow information about signing up a friend or family member's cable to stream content directly from TV network websites, such as FOX or HBO. Some cable services, like DirecTV, even have their own streaming portals. It's crazy how one username and password can get you so much free content. Piggybacking on streaming or cable subscription from a friend or family member can save you a lot of money, but in the end, someone still pays that bill. If you're trying to completely abandon streaming services and the spirit of cable, then you'll need to find a different path to the world of free-to-air TV. This may be against the terms of service for some streaming services, but others encourage you to share with family members. Best free streaming sites: Pluto TV and Crackle If you won't (or can't) borrow someone's login details, you'll need to find free TV in the wild. Fortunately, there are a lot of streaming sites that offer free content, and most of them have a handful of Class A series and movies. The most popular free streaming sites are Pluto TV, which offers more than a hundred live channels showing movies and TV shows, and Sony's Crackle, which provides a variety of TV shows and movies for on-demand streaming. Pluto and Crackle have commercials, of course – but there's cable TV and you pay for it! You can watch them in a web browser, in a smartphone or tablet app, or even on a TV with Roku or a similar device. If these sites don't do this for you, then you would tubes, tubes, tubes and pipes He shares TV and Yidio. You can also use services like YouTube to fuel your fun obsession, but you'll have a lot of trouble finding full episodes of TV shows. On Google, you can find a ton of other free streaming platforms, but you should avoid streaming from any website that looks suspicious. These sites are usually managed illegally and are not always safe to use. Watch on your NETWORK's website If you're trying to watch a show from a specific network, check their website. It sounds silly, but most websites will allow you to stream some (or all) episodes of the series for free. Lifetime, for example, allowed people to stream R Kelly's reusers for free for a while, and networks like Adult Swim routinely stream live TV for free. Need a list of networks offering free content? Watch FOX, BET, CBS, AMC, ABC, The CW, Cartoon Network and NBC. You can also stream free shows from public broadcast networks, such as PBS or the BBC (but you'll need a VPN to watch shows from the BBC because the service is exclusive to Europe). Dust Off Your Library Card As strange as it sounds, you can stream shows and movies from your local library. All you need is a library card and websites like OverDrive or Hoopla. Your public library guaranteed to have a wide range of shows and movies, enough so you can completely forget about streaming services. And you can forget about that Disney+ subscription for a while because most libraries carry a decent selection of Disney movies (well, classic Disney movies). If you're trying to save money, these websites are a lifeguard. You can use them to borrow digital copies of books, comics, music and audiobooks from your public library. And don't worry, you may not even have to drive to the physical library to apply for a library card. Just google the local library card name along with the word sign in. Your local library also offers other free digital content, from eBooks and audiobooks to online newspapers. And, if you're ready to head to the library in person, you might find a nice selection of Blu-Rays, DVDs and CDs that you can borrow for free. RELATED: Not just books: All the free digital stuff your local library might offer take advantage of free free streaming sites don't always have the shows you want. Fortunately, services like Netflix and Hulu typically offer a one-month free test drive. These trials are useful when you know exactly what you want to watch, but you should consider them a last resort. Free versions can only be used once (type), and you can end your account at the end of the month if you forget to cancel your account. That being said, sometimes you can rig the free trial system to work forever. Most streaming services identify you by your email address and card information. By signing up for a free test drive using different cards and email addresses, you can keep free test rides. Unfortunately, this method is not just a test of your moral strength; It is also Half-baked. Streaming services can verify your identity by verifying your credit card's IP address or postal address, and they will (justifiably) deny you a free trial sign-up if they smell anything suspicious. Darrin Meyer FIOS, which Verizon offers in select areas, is a subscription television service through which TV signals and other digital services are delivered home via fiber optic cables, providing higher quality video compared to standard cable. Channels and features available with FIOS counter those of major cable and satellite TV providers, and these features include the ability to access recorded FIOS programming from TVs in different rooms without adding additional DSRs, provided you have the right equipment. Contact a Verizon FIOS representative to request a home media DVR, which is the receiver frame required for multi-room viewing, as well as additional non-DVR decoding(s) for each TV you want to connect. An additional charge will apply for the equipment and the appropriate service. Connect your Home Media DVR to a coaxial socket in the wall and TV that you use for most viewing, using an HDMI or component video cable if your TV has HD capability. Connect the coaxial cable from the wall socket to the coaxial input of the receiver box(s) in each additional viewing room. The information is transmitted between boxes through coaxial cables in the household allowing additional boxes to access the DVR of home media, without cables directly connecting the different boxes. Connect an additional box(s) to another TV(s) in your home using cables supported by that TV (HDMI, component, coaxial or composite). You record programs in the main viewing room using the Home Media DVR and press the DVR button on the remote control with that or any other decimate to access recorded programs. Many TV providers are available on the market. It can be difficult to choose the best service. Verizon provides a TV service known as Verizon Fios. The company uses fiber optics for its TV service and claims its performance outweighs the performance of its competitors. But if the provider service doesn't meet your expectations, you want to cancel. Call 888-553-1555 and enter the phone number associated with your account or account number. Tell your customer service representative that you want to cancel your Fios TV service. Pay an early termination fee if you are still under contract. If you are not under contract, you are not obliged to pay the fee. Return the equipment Verizon gave you. If not, they'll charge you for the equipment. The company will send a mailing sticker along with instructions. Earlier this week, I was on the phone with Spectrum, trying to cancel tv choice's streaming service after I wrote a review for TechHive. Although I signed up for the service online, the only way to cancel was through a customer service call. This, in turn, required a conversation about why I wanted to cancel, warning that my internet fare will return to the standard rate (despite never falling to a lower rate) and pitch to wireless phone service. When a Spectrum representative started asking me what kind of phone I was using and if I was locked in a contract with AT&T, I lost my cool. Do I really have to answer all this? I said. I just want to cancel the TV service. Spectrum TV Choice In fairness, the Spectrum representative quickly relented and proceeded with the cancellation. But in 2019, when people have more streaming TV options than ever, and almost all of these options allow you to disrupt service online by clicking on a few buttons, it's pointless that cable and satellite providers haven't been getting in the way. We should no longer accept that cancellation remains a tedious, intrusive process. I'm saying enough is enough. Why canceling cables is difficult To understand why cable and satellite companies do not have online cancellation systems because it would make the process too simple. TV providers would rather send you to the retention department, where a customer service representative can question your decision, make you question yourself, and possibly hang temporary discounts as a last resort. Customer acquisition is expensive in a near-capacity market, doing everything they can to keep people and make it harder to cut off subscriptions, says Alan Wolk, chief analyst for TVRev. Long wait times on phone chains are also assumed to be part of the plan. Despite this assumption, I wanted to give cable and satellite providers the benefit of the doubt, because there may have been some technical or logistical reason that I wasn't considering. Before submitting this story, I reached out to Comcast, Spectrum, Dish Network and DirecTV for comment. None gave an answer in time for publication. It is worth noting that some companies handle cancellation better than others. Comcast, for example, allows you to cancel a service by filling out a form and sending an email or chatting with an Internet representative between 8 a.m. and .m and 11 p.m.m Eastern Time. Neither option is ideal - especially given that Comcast allows users of its Xfinity Instant TV streaming service to cancel online - but both are better than a mandatory customer service call. The calling process itself has also improved over the years. With Spectrum, I booked a seat in line after going through the company's automated response system, then hung up and got a call back when the man was available. Hulu + Live TV Nevertheless, none of this rationalization can be compared to the process of canceling the streaming service. With Netflix, you can head straight to the cancellation page and turn off your subscription without hassle. Amazon also offers a direct cancellation link, while other services such as Sling TV, PlayStation Vue and Hulu provide clear documentation on how to cancel through their online systems. Even AT&T's direcTV Now streaming service is much easier to from the company's satellite offer. (These links aren't hidden either; they all got top billing in Google search results.) Canceling the service is nothing more burdensome than signing up, which should be for any subscription service. It's time to complain If cable companies have little incentive to offer online cancellations themselves, the law could force them to make things easier. In 2017, the state of California passed a law requiring an online cancellation option for any subscription service that accepts online applications. California Senate Bill No. 313 went into effect last July. He says cancellation methods may include (but are not limited to) formatted emails that users can send without additional information. Unfortunately, cable companies don't appear to be the target of the law. Katie Henzlik, a spokeswoman for state Sen Bob Hertzberg, who introduced the law, said his main goal was to get companies to provide clear notification and cancellation options when someone starts a free trial online. It should affect streaming services like Hulu and Netflix more than cable companies like Spectrum. Richard Holober, executive director of the Consumer Federation of California, which sponsored the bill, said he had not seen any complaints about the cable service either before or after the law was passed. In other words, people are so used to the ritual of calling customer service to cancel a cable that they don't even notice when the law allows themselves a better way. I think it's time for this Stockholm syndrome to end. Instead of simply accepting that cord cancellation was and always will be painful, we should complain and ask why it couldn't be easier. For years, cable companies have insisted that they are trying to improve their historically terrible customer service. I see no reason why this objective should not relate to the act of reducing TV service or cutting directly. Sign up for Jared's Cord Cutter Weekly newsletter to get this column and other cable-cutting news, insights and deals delivered to your inbox. Keep in touch: When you buy something after clicking links in our articles, we can earn a small commission. Read our affiliate link policy for more details. Details.